Money (Russian: Money) is an English word denoting a special product that is a universal equivalent of the cost of other goods and services. The word is often found in various titles, in particular in the titles of many works of art.

We all think we know about money. But do we understand the functions of money, what money actually is, and what it represents? How and when did the first money appear? Do we think of it as a way to measure value? Is it a reliable store of value? Who actually creates the money we use? Is it a commodity to be traded? And how does this money actually relate to our status, to the real value of things we use in our lives, to the effort we make to get them, to the real economy of human settlements?

“...money is not really a thing at all but a social technology.”

Once you start thinking about it, these are remarkably slippery questions, questions which have fooled many throughout millennia. Mostly because the answer seems so obvious. Is it not the coin in your pocket, the dollar bill in its clip, the credit card in your wallet, the check in the mail, the electrical impulse in the computer? Money is all these, and none of them, for it is primarily a way of ordering our lives. But this in a particular, arbitrary way: an attempt to make the often indeterminate qualities of our experience fit neatly into quantities; quantities that can be counted and compared to standard units of account, where everything is valued against a sum of money.

Money is not important but a necessary thing for me. Everybody wants to be a rich that is why you or me should work and study hard. Nowadays money solve all our problems. For example: many people treat your purse. When you have much money others talk or make friends. But money is a justified wealth in our life or in the world. While you have much money, everyone has a lot common with you. It is life. If you are rich or you have money all people meet up with you and get on well you. You might be a rich person in your life. Anyway, happiness is a very beautiful thing for me. Because I have my parents, friends and padente teachers around me. For my dad and for my mom I am happy and they are also my happiness. When you stay healthy, you cook, read, drink and other events are happiness for you. Therefore you never think “I am not happy”...When we want to use something we should have money. Money are used all time in life. If you work hard, you can be rich then you buy everything. For example: you will buy cars, phones, clothes, houses, tickets to travel another countries. So, you will have dreams on your hand. Everything has minus and plus sides. At first, you should be healthy then you can parents, friends then you will have much money by working and studying hard.

Again, money is considered a tool to satisfy the needs of our daily life. It is a pleasure to find it in a halal way and make a cocktail, but it is painful to find it in a sloppy and easy way. There are many gems in life that cannot be sold for money. These things include Motherland, destiny, friendship, love, preciousness, peace, health, children, parents and blood relatives.

Five Reasons Why Money Can't Buy Happiness

Money and trinkets may provide temporary joy but not true happiness. Here are five reasons why happiness derived from money is not everlasting:

1. You Will Never Be Satisfied.

Once you allow money to become your source of happiness, you will never be satisfied. You will always want more because that shiny, new thing will become old and used one day. With technology introducing new products at lightning speed, there will always be a carrot dangling for you to reach for

2. Money Can't Buy True Friends.

Although it may seem like the wealthy are surrounded by an extensive and devoted entourage, oftentimes those "friends" tend to fade away if the money diminishes or someone more affluent and influential arrives on the scene.

3. Happiness is Doing What You Love.

Happiness comes from doing the things you love, not from your bank account balance. As for the passions that require money, such as travel and sporting adventures, budgeting and prioritizing will enable you to spend money on what is important to you.

4. Money Can't Buy Time.

Rather than wasting time to shop and buy, spend your time doing what you love to do.

5. Saving is Important, but Don't Forget to Enjoy Life.

Experiencing and savoring special moments can fill your heart in a way that money cannot.

I think money is not important. Important but is not 100%. Actually, sometimes money is a necessary thing, sometimes is not for me!
